Yachne-Dvoshe's in a dither, packing for the market place. She is off to buy the flour to bake Purim cakes. (Ho, my homentashn! Ho, my white delights! Ho, my homentashn didn't come out quite right!) It's raining, it's snowing, the roofs are dripping, Yachne's bringing cornmeal home in a bag that's ripping. She's brought no honey, no poppy-seed, and forgot the yeast. But Yachne's making homentashn. They're in the oven, at least. Yachne's carrying her Purim gift to her mother-in-law, two or three homentashm, half-burnt and half-raw.
